	In general, what do you do when...	How does what you usually do work out for you?	What could you consider doing instead?
You find the lecture boring	I go into a dream world.	I miss important information and struggle later.	I could take notes and try to stay focused or ask questions.
You have no idea what the professor is talking about	I just listen carefully and try to understand.	Sometimes it helps, but I still remain confused about some parts.	I could take notes, ask questions, and review the topic later to understand better.
You have a question about how what you're learning relates to something you already learned	I imagine scenes from movies, books, or articles to connect the concept. It helps me understand, but I sometimes miss parts of the lecture.	It improves my understanding creatively, but I lose focus and miss some important explanations.	I could note down the connection quickly and then refocus on the lecture to avoid missing key points.
You feel it's very important to understand what is happening in class	When I feel it is important, I try to understand it clearly because I believe only then I can apply it in real life.	It helps me understand deeply and apply concepts practically, but sometimes I focus more only on topics I find important.	I could try to stay consistently focused on all topics and look for real-life applications in every lesson.
You find yourself distracted in class	When there is noise or students talking, I get distracted. I also get distracted by personal thoughts such as sleepiness, attraction, money pressure, marks, or family concerns.	It reduces my concentration and causes me to miss important parts of the lecture.	I could sit away from distractions, stay engaged by taking notes, and manage personal concerns outside class to improve focus.
You are not sure what's really important in lecture	When the professor does not clearly mention what is important, I usually take notes only on points they highlight. If nothing is mentioned, I sometimes assume it is less important.	This sometimes helps me focus, but I may miss important concepts that were not clearly marked.	I could take consistent notes on all key ideas and refer to the syllabus or ask for clarification about important topics.
